In the transition from horse show to horseshoe, society has lost none of the dazzling spiendor-though dazzling is hardly the word. Dazzling suggests diamonds, whereas the horseshoe showed a preponderance of pearls on the opening night of the opera. Pearl coronets, chains of pearls, and one gown covered with pearls clearly showed that the pearl is the fashionable jewel. The opera-house glowed and led one to believe that a certain impoverished but undaunted cotilion leader had carried out his plan of raising fresh water pearls in his bath tub. He collected for this purpose a number of large and prosperous-looking oysters, stowed them away in large tubs, fed them on meal until they became tame and positively ate out of hand, and then, when the oysters had become convinced of their master's good will be villainously inoculated with grains of sand, around which they were to form the pearl of price. Then this man of ideas sat down to await results. He is highly
